Preface

We have worked against the Yack's grain this year.

If you are a Yack watcher, you may reasonably interpret UNC's yearbook as "a picture book." But we're challenging that token message, in light of utilizing our strong resources at hand (photographers, coordinators, designers and writers and researchers) and of utilizing our medium (the book).

To do this, we have included a line of profiles, in the form of 13 stories and many more biographical sketches, for this year's book. This is an addition and an incorporation—not a compromise; we are not fighting our strong photographic and design capabilities, for these are what we've edified for ourselves foremost during the 1980s. But, as said, the pictures will speak for themselves.

Basically, we hope you will now see the 1987 Yackety Yack as UNC's book of the year, certainly lacking the ideal of objectifying the year through presentation of every person, event, organization, University building, etc., etc., etc.

Herewith, we concentrate on UNC and all its pieces through particulars, in a word—profiles.

Naked On Franklin Street

Tar Heels Let it Loose When They Party

by Bert Matthews

A couple of days before graduation my best friend asked me, "When you think back on your time here at Carolina, what moment will stand out strongest in your memory?"

Of course, the first file to be opened from my mental floppy disk selection was titled Party. Sure, I would have liked it to have been Love, Romance or Adventure even Education but it wasn't. It was Party, because '86-'87 had so many outrageous passages to recall.

To start things out was the "Franklin Street Riot."

By 9:30 p.m. the sidewalks of Franklin Street had become clogged with people barhopping for their last legal time. I remember standing on the corner of Franklin and Columbia, outside of Spanky's, and watching some guy motivate the crowd into taking the street. Each time he and the small band of opaque renegades following his command were given the walking green, they bounded into the middle of the crosswalk and sat down chanting, "Hell no, we won't go." Eventually they and the mob that joined them in their revelry succeeded in turning the traffic around and closing Franklin Street.

It all began when, in order to maintain federal highway funding, the N.C. Legislature passed a bill raising the drinking age from 18 to 21. At midnight, when Sunday, August 31 became Monday, September 1, Labor Day, the new law was to go into effect. Tar Heel students "under age" would lose the privilege to purchase even the mildest of distilled spirits. As could be expected, Carolina students would not let this lamentable occasion pass without some form of public outcry.

While a close friend and I sat on one of the benches lining Franklin Street, innocently taking in the chaos that had momentarily gained control of downtown Chapel Hill, I was struck with an idea. "This is a once-in-a-lifetime college experience," said a cajoling voice inside of me. "Not only for you, but all of those attending. It needs something gutsy though, something more original than open consumption of barley pop. It needs some type of revelry that will turn heads, open mouths and curl toes—some rabble rouser that could sufficiently add to the precedent being set here without causing damage to property or discomfort to others. It needs some...some...streakers."

We did it.

This, what some would call a despicably vain and totally inappropriate undermining of conventions, didn't even hold a candle to much of the hoopla that eventually transpired that night.

Once the Franklin Street Riot wound down about 3:30 a.m., Chapel Hill had been privy to 15 arrests, $50,000 of estimated damage, bomb fires, open nudity (no further comment), debauchery, total chaos and one of the most impressive displays of public inebriation and obnoxiousness the town had ever experienced.

UNC administration as well as Chapel Hill police and Town Council members were so thoroughly disgusted with the behavior the riot fostered, measures were taken to see that this sort of thing would not happen again.

During Halloween, police lined the sidewalks of Franklin Street to assure the masquerading crowd would not spill out into the street. It didn't. But just to make certain the reins of discipline were securely in hand, the Chapel Hill Town Council passed an amendment in February that limited the acceptable level of outdoor noise.

This reduction in acceptable decibels for outdoor events was seen by students as another infringement of the rights of the town's majority—the students—to have a good time. This effort by a select, powerful group of the town's wealthier residents to dictate the tone of future Carolina parties was successfully challenged by student members and Student Congress. By April a healthy compromise was reached that preserved the rights of students to hold outdoor parties as long as the music finished no later than 12:30 a.m. and didn't exceed 77 decibels.

Despite the compromise on noise, Pi Kappa Phi's infamous Burnout party, which had attracted 3,000 to 4,000 in past years, was reduced to smoldering ashes when the Town Council denied the fraternity's request for a noise permit.

Nevertheless, Carolina party troopers proved they could party hard and responsibly. UNC police major Charles E. Mauer told 1987 Springfest organizers that the concert on Connor Beach was the best run ever. No arrests were reported, and cleanup was handled in about two hours—with aluminum cans, glass bottles and paper collected for recycling by the Society of Environmentally Concerned Students.

Personally, though, one of my favorite parties last year began at a friend's house with a few of "the guys" sitting around taking long draws from cans of National Bohemian.

We were listening to the radio crank out some of our favorite tunes, playing air guitars and talking about our chances of getting "lucky" in the very near future.

Some party, right? A Friday night scene that's been repeated and replayed by countless scores of college youths for innumerable years. Borrrring.

Suddenly someone had an idea. We catapulted ourselves to the Community Church on Purefoy Road where each year in October the German department holds an Oktoberfest. This under-attended occasion comes outfitted with a German oom-pah-pah band in lederhosen and all the beer you can drink.

Unlike most college parties, the Oktoberfest is a party where everybody dances—together, not by themselves. It is a time to brush up on your polka or to learn the polka. It is an opportunity to dance hand and hand, arm and arm with women you've never met before dressed in traditional Bavarian dirndls. It is a chance to do something unconventional without taking your clothes off.

That night was a wild whirl of spinning couples, boisterous laughter, spilt beer and merriment. It was a night rounded by a harvest moon and friends stumbling home arm in arm singing—like proper Tar Heels.

U.S. Olympic Festival-'87—July 17-26, 1987

A Festival of Records

North Carolina Wins a Gold for Organization

by James Farrer

When U.S. Olympic Festival-'87 was over, Gov. James G. Martin told the U.S. Olympic Committee he wanted it back.

"We showed we could do it on a grass-roots basis and break all those records," Martin said at the closing ceremonies July 26. "Now all we need is a chance to break our own records."

The records he was referring to were the record 460,884 spectators attending the 34 events and the more than $3 million in ticket sales, which put the festival about $1 million in the black.

Over 3,000 of America's best amateur athletes competed in the festival at sites in Raleigh, Durham, Greensboro, Cary and Chapel Hill. For many, the festival was a prelude to the 1988 Olympic Games in Seoul.

The festival ended as it began—with a bang. During the closing ceremonies in Wallace Wade Stadium in Durham and the opening ceremonies in Carter Finley Stadium in Raleigh, fireworks by the Zambelli family—"the first family of fireworks"—lit up the sky for over a quarter hour.

In the closing ceremonies, which honored over 8,000 festival volunteers, Martin praised the efforts of the most important volunteer in the festival, H. Hill Carrow, the president of N.C. Amateur Sports and the man most responsible for bringing the event to the Triangle.

"Hill was the fellow who early on told us this was possible," Martin said to a cheering crowd of 19,000. "Now aren't you delighted and pleased we invited this great event to come to the state of North Carolina?"

Carrow said the festival was certain to put North Carolina on the sports map and that representatives from every sporting event had approached him about holding national competitions in North Carolina.

"If a sport goes someplace, one of the major factors will be support by the spectators," Carrow said. "That has come off very well for us, leading to all the interest in the area."

At 32, Carrow is the youngest person ever to direct a U.S. Olympic Festival organizing committee. A native of Kinston, he was a Morehead Scholar at UNC and a member of the Tar Heel's varsity swimming team. He is a lawyer for Carolina Power and Light.

Because of Carrow's six years of advance planning, the festival became a major media event attended by over 2,400 reporters, more than in the first six Olympic Festivals combined. ESPN broadcast 110 hours of the event with at least 41 hours of live air time. Beginning months before the opening ceremonies July 17, North Carolinians were bombarded ad nauseum with television and radio ads proclaiming, "Let the torch that sets our hearts on fire light a fire in you."

Although only five North Carolina cities hosted the festival, the rest of the state got involved during the torch run. The run began with the lighting of the torch at Pike's Peak in Colorado Springs, Colo. and wound its way from Wilmington to Raleigh for the opening ceremonies. It was said that the crisscrossing trail brought the torch within 50 miles of almost every North Carolina resident. In all, the torch went through 375 cities, was carried by almost 8,000 runners and traveled 2,800 miles.

The festival was not just a sporting spectacular. There was also a "North Carolina Arts Celebration" and an "International Congress on Sports Medicine & Science."

In the "Arts Celebration" during the opening weeks of the festival, new works of film, dance and music were presented. The sports medicine congress—the largest of its kind in the state's history—featured presentations by coaches, trainers and physicians from around the world.

On the sporting front, the outlook for the festival was anything but rosy in the weeks before it began. In many sports, including women's gymnastics and men's track and field, the biggest name performer-athletes decided to stay home.

The athletes who did show—from long-standing international champs to a slew of rising young stars—delighted enthusiastic North Carolina audiences nevertheless.

Diver Greg Louganis, a double gold medal winner in the 1984 Los Angeles Olympics, added to his Olympic golden booty with another win in the 10-meter platform diving competition.

Sarah Anderson, a 16-year-old swimmer from Riverside, Calif., set a festival record by winning six gold medals.

Jessie Grieco, 13, of Emerson, N.Y. became the youngest winner of a festival gold medal in cycling by winning not just one but two gold medals.

Sprinter Valerie Briscoe, winner of three gold medals in the 1984 Olympics, won yet another gold in the 200-meter dash.

Sheila Walker, U.S. Olympic Committee director of festivals and competitions said the North Carolina festival was the biggest and best ever.

"You're taking every [attendance] record by storm," she said at a press conference before the closing ceremonies. "You're not just breaking them by a little. You're breaking them by a lot. The festival has come of age."

Thanks to the residents of North Carolina, she might have added.

Athletes Line Up for Drug Testing

by Marion Presler

In the fall 1986, UNC's Athletic Association implemented a policy of mandatory drug testing for all varsity athletes. During the school year, tests revealed use of marijuana and other "recreational" drugs by less than one percent of 600 student athletes.

Similar programs in Washington and California were declared unconstitutional violations of privacy by state courts in the spring and summer 1987. UNC's policy was under review during the summer, with major revisions likely for the fall 1987.

Drug abuse was a growing national concern this year, and the death of former Maryland basketball star Len Bias by a cocaine overdose put drug use by college athletics in the limelight.

The mandatory testing policy also guaranteed that UNC complied with the National Collegiate Athletic Association's mandatory drug testing rule.

But it was not just public pressure and the NCAA that concerned the Athletic Association, officials said, but also the University's commitment to the athletes themselves—expressed through drug education and counseling programs.

"We could get rid of drug testing entirely—it's the least important thing we do here," said Dr. Joseph L. DeWalt, the director of sports medicine and the physician responsible for supervising the urine tests.

"No one wants to hear about our drug education and drug counseling program. Everyone is interested in urine testing," he said.

Susan M. Gray, a health educator in charge of the drug education program at Student Health Services, said the urine test also provides a "reality hold" for athletes. It is easier for a drug-abusing athlete to say no to drugs if he knows that his urine will be tested, she said.

UNC had already had a voluntary urine testing and drug counseling program for athletes since 1984.

The voluntary urine test was a diagnostic tool that helped SHS identify the athletes who used drugs. The results were kept confidential. Coaches were not informed.

"Participation was nearly 100 percent because they had a choice," Gray said. "It's human nature—people don't like to be told what they have to do with no back door."

There was no back door with the mandatory policy. All 600 of UNC's varsity athletes and student trainers from both revenue and non-revenue sports were subject to urine testing at any time during the season or off-season. Each week, 40 names were randomly drawn. The athletes were usually given 24 hours notice prior to the drug test. Most drugs take more than 48 hours to leave the body, so the 24 hour warning did not affect the test results.

The test was administered in the bowels of Woollen gym in the old training room. The procedure was simple—a bizarre cross between Orwell's 1984 and potty training. The men were required to appear in only shorts and women in T-shirts and shorts. The male athletes produced a urine sample under the supervision of an official test administrator. Women retired to the privacy of an adjacent bathroom. This procedure was designed to preclude cheating on the urine test.

If drugs were detected in a urine sample, sanctions were imposed on the athlete. With his first positive test results, the athlete was put on probation and in the counseling and rehabilitation program. After two positive tests, the athlete was suspended one year from the team. After a third positive test, the athlete was suspended permanently from the team and lost his athletic scholarship.

The urine was tested for drugs banned by the NCAA including marijuana, cocaine, heroin, amphetamines and steroids.

In the summer 1987, associate athletic director Richard A. Baddour assembled a group of student athletes, coaches, administrators, faculty members and the Athletic Association who reviewed the drug testing and counseling program.

Although he refused to give details of changes in the program before they were to be announced in August, he said they would include a greater emphasis on counseling and possible changes in the nature of the sanctions against athletes who tested positive.

According to the American Civil Liberties Union, mandatory drug testing constitutes a bodily search which is forbidden under the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution. The Amendment makes it illegal to search citizens indiscriminately without a particular suspicion. According to ACLU, an institution cannot subject someone to a urine test unless there is evidence that he is using drugs.

On the basis of this privacy argument, student athletes at Stanford University and the University of Washington won suits barring the mandatory drug testing programs of the NCAA in California and the University of Washington. The constitutions of both Washington and California have provisions protecting the right to privacy—provisions only implicit in the U.S. Constitution.

North Carolina also has a privacy provision within its constitution, and a challenge to UNC's drug testing program might be mounted on that basis here as well. No UNC students have taken the issue to court.

One of the likely changes in UNC's program for the fall 1987 would be asking students to sign voluntary consent forms saying they will submit to drug testing if they participate in a varsity sport, Baddour said. Although students will not be allowed to participate in varsity athletics without signing the forms, the University may still be able to claim that the program is voluntary rather than mandatory.

This policy change may allow the University to circumvent a legal challenge to drug testing like those successfully organized by the ACLU in Washington and California.

The courts have said that it is illegal to make the exercise of a constitutionally guaranteed right contingent upon a nominally voluntary act, such as submitting to a drug test. Thus it would violate the constitution to require that anyone "voluntarily" submit to a drug test in order to exercise a basic right such as voting. Such a drug testing program would in fact no longer be voluntary, but coercive.

Participating on an athletic team, however, may not be deemed a constitutionally guaranteed right by the courts, and thus a test to which all athletes must submit in order to be on a team may nevertheless be considered voluntary.

Those who defend mandatory drug testing say that to play for UNC is a privilege not a right. Responsibilities go with the privilege, and one of those responsibilities is to be drug free. The University contracts the student athlete; in return for playing on a team, the athlete has to sign a waiver stating he will agree to drug testing. The University must be fair in the application of the policy and follow correct due process if the policy is violated. The athlete's responsibilities to his teammates, his school and the public outweigh the athlete's right to privacy.

The U.S. Supreme Court is not expected to decide a drug testing case soon, and ACLU officials say most cases will be determined in state courts using state constitutions as a guide.

Even if urine testing infringes on athletes' civil liberties, many of UNC's athletes and coaches support the program.

"What they are trying to do is help kids out; it's a valid effort," said Kelly Williams, a shot putter.

"One thing I don't understand is why it's just athletes—what about the band and fraternities?" she said.

Danny Burmeister, a football player, said: "By the time a guy gets to college, he has put a lot of time into football. You just can't give it up. Most guys, if they have to choose between drugs and football, will choose football."

Frank Comfort, the swimming coach, displayed no reservations.

"I'm delighted," Comfort said. "I supported it while some of the ideas were being developed, and I'm delighted it has been put into effect. Sure, it is a controversial issue but if you look at it from a 40-year-old's eyes, the damn stuff is illegal, and that's the bottom line."

Canned Vitality

Caffeine, Runnin' All Around Our Brains

by Jill Gerber

In 1984, millions of vending machines around the globe spat out $6.7 billion worth of their fizzy bounty to junk food seekers and the nutritionally unconcerned.

If a bifocaled economist were to sharpen his pencil and chart these billions in pie form, UNC students would most assuredly make up quite a hefty slice. For anyone who listens to the incessant rattling of coins at the Student Union's Great Refreshment Mecca knows that a Tar Heel thrives on the invisible nectar derived from the fruits of the soda machine: caffeine.

The drive to become caffeinated is, of course, all very innocent on the part of the Carolinian, who does so only to increase his or her academic performance. A Diet Coke, for example, is largely considered mandatory for remaining coherent during an 8 o'clock class. And in the evening, a Dr. Pepper provides a needed jumpstart for the fatigued library dweller. For many, this mysterious substance is as vital to schoolwork as, say, pen and notebook.

During finals, the quest for cola is more pressing than ever as the unlikely academian searches for a means of making his brain cells more receptive to the chapters of econ that he hadn't gotten around to reading since his midterm. A sure sign of exam-time is when the trashcans in front of Davis Library are heaped with more aluminum than Frat Court on a football Saturday.

As the caffeine connoisseur will relate, certain beverages are richer in the desired drug than others. Out of the Student Union selection, Mello Yello wins the award for packing the most caffeine per 12-ounce can. For the calorie conscious, Tab has the most of the pulse-quickenning drug. But a can of soda has only one-third the caffeine of a cup of strongly brewed coffee, and those desperate in their search for stimulation forego the soda route altogether for a cup of java from Lenoir.

However, the caffeine junkies' soda award goes to a new kid on the block: Jolt Cola, the junk food that dares to be unhealthy. Encased in a red and yellow, lightning bolt embellished can and laden with caffeine and thick with sugar, this fizzy beverage will peel the skin off your tongue.

The Jolt Company, Inc., lauds its product as containing "all the sugar and twice the caffeine" of regular soft drinks. In 1979, father and son masterminds Joseph and C.J. Rapp of Rochester, N.Y., decided they were disgusted with wimpy tasting sodas. They concocted a variety packing a hearty 71.2 milligrams of caffeine per can, which squeaks right under the legal limit of 72 milligrams. Seven years later, Jolt was on the market, quickening pulse rates and boring holes in tooth enamel nationwide.

The soda can—like Davis Library, the Pit and basketball—has become a Tar Heel institution in itself as students seek to complete their tasks at a slightly more accelerated rate than their predecessors. No one need ponder the shape of academia in the University's near-future. It is, without doubt, cylindrical.

Jill Gerber is editor of The Daily Tar Heel.

Dying in the Light

A Student with AIDS Confronts His Mortality

by James Farrer

AIDS, like a specter from the Dark Ages, has stolen into the glitzy, technological bastion of American optimism.

Even the comfortable and educated in Chapel Hill gray with fear at this primitive, even atavistic, threat to their lives and sexual freedom. It has struck the young most of all, and our community has seen its first victims.

UNC student Wain Gaskill, 24, of Morehead City is one of the first. While taking a semester break from his studies in drama and speech communications, he entered N.C. Memorial Hospital in March with what he thought was bronchitis. His condition was diagnosed as Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome.

Sitting on the floor in a friend's apartment in Carrboro, wolfing down two day-old Krispy Kreme glazed doughnuts and drinking Coca-Cola, Wain failed to fit my preconception of an AIDS victim.

His body, clad in shorts and a tight black tank-top, was a beautiful cracked vessel—broad shoulders and thick muscular thighs as ephemeral as the limbs of an ice sculpture—bound to collapse from the invisible breath of disease.

I couldn't help but think that he looked healthier than I, as he told me his story in the clear impassioned voice of a trained actor.

"I was the first person I ever knew with AIDS," he said.

"It all seems so strange looking back on it. The doctor came in about eight in the evening and said that the tests had come back positive, and they were making a diagnosis of AIDS. He said it pretty much like that—very calculated, cool. So I was very calculated and cool and just lay there. I thought when he left the room I would probably break down, but I didn't. I just kind of stared up at the ceiling for a while."

Wain said it took him over three weeks to recover from the pneumocystis, the rare form of pneumonia that often strikes AIDS victims. Confined to his hospital bed, he received drugs against the infection through an intravenous tube and suffered through daily bouts of severe nausea as a side effect.

"I got better to the point where I could get up and go look at myself in the mirror," he said. "I could wash my face, brush my hair—groom myself a little. I'd look in the mirror, and it would be the strangest feeling. I would touch my little reflection, and it would be like, 'Wow, you have AIDS. You're the only person.' It was a terribly strange and frighteningly alone kind of feeling."

Now he feels good, he said. Since he left the hospital, he has gained twenty pounds—an unusual amount for an AIDS patient. He walks long distances, runs and goes dancing often with his friends.

Wain's only present hope is the drug AZT. If, in this age of sterile clinical acronyms, AIDS is the newest name for the newest Black Death, then AZT—the only drug approved by the FDA for use with AIDS patients—is the acronym of hope for the victims. But, like the pockets full of posies of their medieval counterparts, it fails as miserably in warding off their ultimate doom.

Doctors say Wain is responding well to the AZT, marketed as Retrovir. But with the same doctors telling him he can expect to live only 18 months, every day holds the fear of the onset of another attack on his shattered immune system.

"Even with Retrovir, I will eventually become sick again," he said, "probably with pneumonia or cancer. With any luck I'll live through the second illness, recover somewhat and go on. Apparently it's a progression—you keep getting sicker with time."

"The difficult part of this illness is you don't know how to approach the rest of your life because you don't know if you really have those eighteen months, or if it's going to be eighteen years or eighteen days. No one can say."

"There's a part of me that's almost willing to take the dare, to say: 'I'm going to make a long-term plan. I'm going to move to Atlanta next year. I want to audition for this part or I want to be in this film.' Then there's a part of me that's really afraid to tempt fate and to make a long term plan. There's just a part of me that lives for the day—for the moment."

Depression and fear are his worst problems, Wain said. His most severe depression came when a friend, a UNC graduate, died of AIDS in May.

"He didn't even know he was ill," Wain said. "He came down with pneumonia, and two weeks later he died. He didn't even have his eighteen months, and we didn't even know he was ill until the call came that he was dead. I was like, 'Oh shit, it could have been me.' There was a part of me that almost wished that it was—that it would have happened to me like that, that I would have gone that quickly and not have known."

Throughout the depression and physical hardship, Wain has found support in his friends and family. He said he has not experienced the isolation and rejection that many AIDS victims complain of.

"I can tell you that physical affection and words of encouragement are a much better tonic than the AZT I'm taking," he said. "It's just a shame that there are lots of AIDS patients out there who can't get that like I am."

Although friends let him sleep at their homes for free, buy him meals, treat him to movies and let him borrow their cars, Wain's illness has reduced him to poverty.

Federal Medicaid paid his $15,000 hospital bill and pays for his $1,000 monthly drug costs, but his $300 monthly disability checks are not enough to live on.

"I was going to school and working full time," Wain said. "I had just enough money to pay rent and that was about it. When I got sick, I had nothing. Imagine living on $300 a month and trying to pay rent. I kind of laugh when I think about it."

Wain said he didn't have a boyfriend when he was diagnosed as having AIDS, and he doesn't know where he contracted the disease. He said he hasn't slept with anyone since he came down with AIDS.

"I have seen a guy a couple of times recently," he said. "We have discussed it, and it is no problem with him as long as we are responsible: using condoms, not exchanging body fluids, etc. Just because I have AIDS does not mean I have to lead a celibate lifestyle, but it does mean I have a certain responsibility. Keeping that in mind, I guess I am getting back into the swing of things as far as going out with people and dating. I've missed doing that."

Wain will not go gentle into that good night. He seizes the day, enjoying the time he spends with his friends and speaking about AIDS to groups around the Triangle.

"It's almost flattering to be in a situation and to say I am a whole lot stronger than I thought," he said. "You discover a lot when you are faced with the monumental task of adjusting to your mortality. I think everyone has to do that at some point."

A Timely Protest

Weak-kneed and Inspired, a Student Marches on Washington

by James Gardner

If nothing else, it was a timely protest. In the days and weeks after the Mobilization for Justice and Peace in Central America and Southern Africa, Contra forces killed American volunteer worker Benjamin Linder; President Reagan reiterated his commitment to Contra funding; retired Maj. Gen. Richard Secord, testifying before the committee investigating the Iran/Contra affair, not only joked about his involvement but smugly defended the policy; the extreme right-wing Conservative Party advanced in South Africa's white-only elections; and a "legal ethicist" interviewed on Ted Koppel's "Nightline" claimed he saw no need for civil disobedience in 1987 because there was no situation as extreme as, say, Nazism.

The Washington Post called the April 25 march and rally a "'60s-Style Protest," as if justice and peace were outré.

For us protesters, the event was at once a means of showing solidarity with the oppressed peoples of Central America and Southern Africa and a vent for our anger and outrage over our country's foreign policies. It was also a celebration (albeit one dampened by a wintry Washington rain) of the coming together of about 75,000 representatives of an America that rejects the exclusionist WASP definition of this country pushed by the mass media, politicians and businessmen.

In many ways, of course, it was a '60s-style protest. At the morning rally, Peter, Paul and Mary sang "Blowin' in the Wind" and "This Land Is Your Land," and later I saw three tie-dyed shirted youths dancing in the mud à la Woodstock during a high-decibel performance by a funk band. Many of the banners and slogans invoked '60s protests in style and tone, and there was ample display of guerilla-theater protest, such as an Uncle Sam on stilts who bore a pale skull mask and hurled money bags representing Contra funding, or the bloody mannequin torso carried by two protesters that read "Contras is Another Word for Death Squad."

If a single message could be inferred from this political gumbo, apart from the rejection of the Reagan administration's foreign policies, it was one of inclusion. These protesters, from the El Salvadoran mothers whose children had been massacred to the Detroit auto workers wearing baseball caps that sported anti-apartheid slogans, represented a diverse America.

The Rainbow Coalition's multi-colored flag waving against the cloudy sky symbolized this diversity, but I'm not sure even Jesse Jackson envisioned so many different groups. According to the official program, 16 contingents marched, including: labor and religious groups, Latinos, Central America and South Africa activists, feminists, anti-racists, veterans, lesbians and gays, environmentalists, disarmament activists and the elderly.

After gathering in the Ellipse adjacent to the White House, the groups marched in

the rain down Pennsylvania Avenue to the Capitol. They sang songs ("We Shall Overcome," "Down By The Riverside"), chanted slogans (The North Carolina contingent shouted, "Jesse Helms has Got to Go!") and carried flags and banners that identified themselves and stated their messages: "Jobs, not War and Racism," "Support El Salvador's Labor Movement," "CIA Out Of Nicaragua," "Victory to the ANC," "Nobody Needs Apartheid, Contras, SDI," "War—What Good is it For? Absolutely Nothing." There was even a group of cyclists carrying a banner that read "Bikes not Bombs in Central America."

My experience of the protest was fragmented, as confirmed by my missing the climax of the day's events, the afternoon speeches at the Capitol by Jesse Jackson, Ed Asner and the others. My companion and I opted for food and shelter after spending hours in the cold and rain. Thin-skinned protesters, I admit.

After taking refuge in the Library of Congress's restrooms and then eating cheese subs in a nearby Greek deli, it was almost time to head back to the bus for the trip home after a grim, wet day.

The day's gloom was foreshadowed by our arrival from Chapel Hill, as the bus dispensed us in the Pentagon parking lot in the rain. If love and beauty were physically extracted from the world, the Pentagon would be the result; its facade is as ugly as all that goes on within. The cold and rain, therefore, seemed appropriate, as it was hard to imagine the sun ever shining on that massive tomb.

Even the great symbols of freedom—the Washington Monument, the Capitol Building, the White House—appeared strange and distant. The monolithic structures seemed to merge with the clouds and the cold to give an aura of gray imposition and inaccessibility.

My encounter with these architectural symbols, however, did not shape my experience nearly as forcefully as did the faces, voices and images of the protesters. I might not remember the little I heard of Jesse Jackson's speech, but I remember the brazen faces of the young El Salvadoran men who beat drums and chanted "No Pasaran!"

I remember the family from Charlottesville, Va. who rode the Metro at day's end. The two small children, exhausted from the day's excitement, collapsed peacefully on their father's lap. I also remember the charcoal hair, the chiseled face and the proud eyes of the Latino man who pushed an elderly woman's wheelchair.

On the one hand, there were many positive, even lighthearted, moments, such as the surprise family reunion I witnessed. "Grandpa!" shouted a woman and two teenagers happily as they rushed up to an elderly man who held a banner decrying the bomb. "We didn't know you were here!" Grandpa just smiled as beads of rain dropped from his nose. The family who protests together...?

On the other hand, there were some depressing, even banal, moments. As we marched past the White House gates, I was frightened for an instant by what sounded like a machine gun. But the "rat-a-tat-tat" was only the product of some wooden thingamajig toted by a blonde college-aged youth in hiking boots. He grinned as he marched along chanting something about "kicking Reagan's ass." Arlo Guthrie was right when he said a person can be for peace and still be an asshole.

Returning from Washington rain-soaked and weary, I brought home these items: a bus pass, a Metro ticket, a program of the day's events, a small red FMLN flag, a flyer calling for the boycott of General Electric, a flyer supporting the Puerto Rico Independence 16 and a badge protesting General Motors plant closings that reads, "A Job Is A Right." These were the symbols of a day's participation in democracy, of a small attempt to change the world for the better.

As the news reminds relentlessly in the days and weeks since the march, there is plenty of work to be done.

Black Apathy

Activists Face the Challenge of Complacency

by Guy Lucas

This was a pivotal year for black activism.

But only because there wasn't much of it.

Until an April 3 demonstration organized by the Black Student Movement, blacks had shown little visible concern for a range of issues that black leaders felt should have been drawing large numbers out to protest.

Foremost among these was the University administration's failure to meet the terms of a 1981 federal consent decree for minority enrollment. Under the decree, predominantly white schools in the UNC system were to have black enrollment of greater than 10.6 percent by 1987. Blacks made up just 7.8 percent of the 1986-87 undergraduate population, however, a drop from 8.8 percent in 1985-86 and 9.5 percent in 1984-85. Blacks accounted for 9.41 percent of the 1986 freshman class, compared with 10.9 percent in 1984.

Yet protests over these figures remained confined largely to black leaders, who claimed the administration wasn't trying, despite University officials saying they made "a good-faith effort."

The apparent decline of black activism from its peak in 1983-84, when the Campus Governing Council attempted to defund the Black Ink and take away the BSM Gospel Choir's travel money, frustrates current and past black leaders.

"What it tells me is there is complacency," said Reggie Holley, speaker of the CGC in 1984-85 and 1985 candidate for student body president, in an interview for the Phoenix. "When you build and rest and pat yourselves on the back and say 'Look what we've got now,' it says, 'Let's put out the fires.'"

The consensus is that blacks have lost a focus for their activism; that no great, central issue dominates their attention. While three years ago blacks turned out to show concern over the BSM's fight to win the use of the Upendo Lounge in Chase Hall, little attention has been given to the development of the Black Cultural Center. Sherrod Banks, 1983-85 BSM president, said part of the reason is a fundamental difference in the nature of the problems.

"There is no less involvement on the part of the work concerned,...it's just that Upendo was seen as a confrontation—the BSM versus the administration,” he said.

The BCC struggle is in having students doing paperwork and wading through bureaucracy they aren't trained for, he said. It took two years, but construction began in the spring.

Lacking a crisis, black leaders have had the difficult task of having to try to motivate the students.

“Minority enrollment is a crisis, but it's not perceived as one,” Banks said. “They have heard it so long....It's not a new sore, it's an old sore that has been reopened.”

The major black issues—enrollment, faculty and student retention, the BCC and divestment—have proven to be difficult as motivators since many blacks don't perceive these as having a direct effect on their lives.

“It's like we're waiting for some issue that's going to bring us together again,” said 1985-86 BSM President Sibby Anderson. There are issues out there, but “people wait for a big issue.”

Black involvement is also sorely lacking in the campus's largest mostly white groups, such as Student Government and The Daily Tar Heel. Only one black ran for Student Congress, the group that controls student fees spending, and candidates for DTH editor always promise to increase minority representation at the paper, often with a “recruitment program” that never seems to materialize.

Holley said he felt that a more active BSM was needed to encourage more blacks to get involved in all groups. During the April 3 rally in front of South Building, newly elected BSM President Kenny Perry and other black leaders strongly encouraged blacks to do just that.

Another major cause of the decline of visible black activism is the perception that racism has been defeated, black leaders said.

Eric Walker, 1986-87 BSM vice president and a well-recognized black activist on campus, said some blacks were focusing on academics to the exclusion of all else.

“Many blacks take the attitude: ‘I'm at Carolina, one of the best schools in the nation, therefore I've made it,’” he said. They ignore the aid cuts or racist attitudes that keep other blacks out. “As long as they feel that way, that's the biggest failure in itself.”

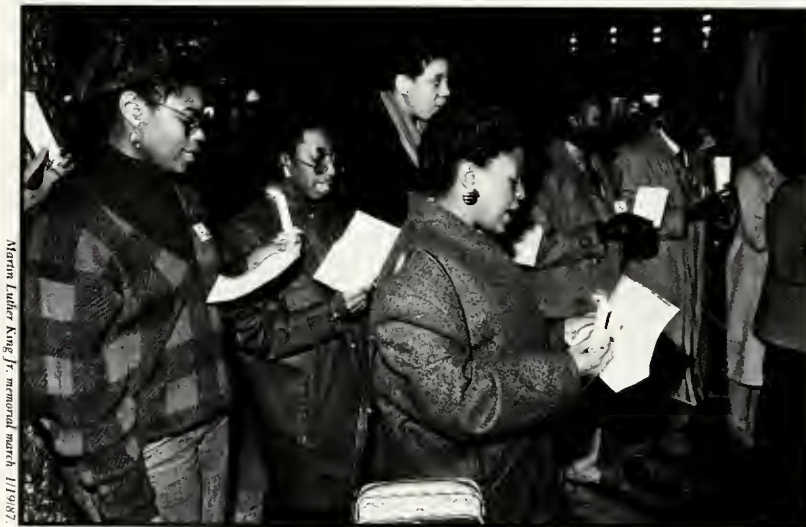

Walker and Banks said activism hasn't necessarily declined, but rather the nature of the threat has changed and is causing activism to change and meet it.

“The racist aspect of society is much more subtle now,” Walker said. “You cannot come out and say, ‘racism,’ without conclusive proof.”

Black leaders now are working to find new ways to motivate the mass of black students to become more involved. At the April 3 rally, they promised greater visibility from the BSM and a concerted effort to go reach out to black students.

The next year will tell black leaders if that's all that's needed, or if the problem is really more complicated.

Exorcising Shearon Harris

Cummings Conjures the Spirits of the Piedmont

by Marcie Cloutier

A Uwarian sandstone, a chalice, two shining crystals, bark cloth from the Philippines, a homemade ceramic chart that follows the waxing and waning of the moon and multi-colored gourd rattles: it is from these objects that Bill Cummings tapped energy and wisdom for his fight against the Shearon Harris nuclear plant.

"All my life I think I have been creating altars," said Cummings, who lives in Chapel Hill and is a co-founder of the Coalition for Alternatives to Shearon Harris.

The objects listed above make up one of two altars he has arranged in his home, and each object has a special meaning. The chalice was passed around during two pre-CASH retreats in which future members informed and empowered themselves for the imminent fight against Carolina Power and Light, owners of the plant.

Cummings brought the bark cloth from the Philippines, where he confirmed his anti-nuclear beliefs after he observed the workings of a Philippine plant. Cummings said the plant, funded by the United States, was poorly planned and unsafe, and the Philippine people were denied a voice in the decision to build it.

He made the ceramic moon chart himself. He said that charting time through the waxing and waning of the moon puts him in closer touch with the pulse of Nature, the pulse of the Piedmont.

"The deeper parts of myself, older wisdom, spirit gods and the spirits of this place—whatever divinity exists is happening now," he said. "It's moving energy."

For Cummings, the direct voices of Nature provide sustenance on a personal, local and national level, especially regarding resource policy. He attributes his most effective preparation for CASH to the months he lived off the land near the Haw River in Alamance County. There, he said, he listened to the murmur of the trees and the river, the sounds of spirituality.

"The message I clearly heard was to stand up for the integrity of the ecological system, our integrity as people," he said.

"We don't have to subject our children to poison."

When CASH's fight got underway in April 1986, though, he was out of the forest and back in his McCauley Street home, where the soft, natural murmurs became the earnest and dedicated voices of hundreds of CASH activists working there at all hours.

Soon, Cummings said, his roommates moved out. He saw less and less of his children and lost touch with his parents. The entire downstairs of his home was converted into CASH headquarters.

CASH's primary concerns were provisions for public protection in the operation of the plant, the cost of the plant to the taxpayer and viable and safer energy alternatives to which the plant could be converted.

Cummings gravitated toward a grass roots, community level approach to planning.

"We must tap the built-in healing mechanisms which exist in our communities," he said, "and not resort to the mechanical, linear, we'll-fix-it approach our country uses now."

His current attitude draws from his work in the "opposite camp," i.e. national government, to whom he attributes the high-tech, linear approach. He has worked for such agencies as the World Bank and the United Nations as an environmental/ecological specialist.

"There [I saw that] too much of the diversity of life is being lost to mechanical and technical growth and development," he said.

CASH has garnered a large following, and in the course of a year, influenced major decisions, such as resolutions by local assemblies opposing Shearon Harris and Chatham County's decision refusing participation in the evacuation plan required by federal law.

With every step forward, though, the group has been pushed back. A report from a confidential informant working in the plant that alleged faulty construction and violations of building regulations by workers was judged unreliable by the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

Cummings said the NRC response was not surprising. He said that the NRC and the federal government promote nuclear energy with very little emphasis on its safety and the frequent violations of regulations.

Despite the efforts of CASH, Shearon Harris went into full commercial operation in spring 1987. But Cummings' perseverance has not diminished.

According to him, the future strategy of CASH lies in more effective publication of the health hazards of low-level radiation emissions, the economic squeeze imposed on the taxpayer by an increase in the base tax rate and results from the monitoring of radiation emissions by a group affiliated with CASH.

Furthermore, Cummings intends to create a Center for Regional Alternatives. Just as Shearon Harris has viable alternatives, he said, there are a host of alternatives regarding other pressing environmental issues, such as the contamination of our waters.

"We need participation, dialogue," he said. "We need to encourage the celebration of this place, re-sanctify this region. There's a way to harvest our resources so we may yield forever."

Many might view skeptically Cummings' politics, his notion of "community healing" and his grass roots methods, but his energy and tenacity through two years of work with CASH lend immense credit to his empowering personal energy resource: the natural life around him and its spirit gods.

Billy Warden Tickles Our Tarry Toes

by Sean Rowe

It is the day after graduation, and the music stores on Franklin Street have just been hand-delivered a fresh supply of Billy Warden's first record, a 45 rpm disc cut with two more-or-less-hit singles and wearing a low-budget homemade dust cover. Outside in the vernal heat, Billy's black-and-chrome Buick Electra is idling in neutral. From tail to nose it measures 20 feet—a dinosaur of a car, the kind that went out of style fast during the Arab oil embargo. The cracked blue plastic dashboard, with its tilt steering wheel, "climate control" knobs and power-window toggles, is like the control panel of an aircraft. The gas pedal is the size of a shoebox lid.

Billy comes out of a record shop, waving and fairly screaming at passersby. He jumps in, starts talking, and the magnanimous car moves off into traffic. The town falls away, and now there are cows and horses, green fields and red clay. You are going for a ride in the country with what Zen Buddhists call an "original mind."

"I really believe everything I've said," Billy insists. "I would say I really do firmly believe that there are little purple helicopters flying all around us all the time doing traffic reports for some small purple colony, and I believe that every time you itch there's an earthquake in Mongolia."

When you called Billy at his home in Raleigh this morning, the telephone hardly had a chance to ring before he answered: "Oh! Oh, my God, you scared me! Hello?" Billy explains that he was talking to and caressing the phone at the very moment you called. "You know, my mother has a thing about plants—I have a thing about appliances and so forth."

Billy gives you a pair of overlarge, square-lensed sunglasses. You put them on. The cows turn purple along the roadside and the red clay bright pink. You are seeing the world through the eyes of Billy Warden, and the world is a beautiful sight. The Buick begins to shake furiously—there is something wrong with the steering, and on the whole the machine is just too big for the road—but you feel safe nonetheless. On the front seat there is a big chromatic harmonica made in Shanghai and an orange hairbrush. There is a small collection of cassette tapes, ranging from "Van Halen" to "Best of the Monkees" and including some experimental cuts by Billy's band, the Floating Children. In the back seat, amid piles of clothes, an unstrung electric guitar, lawn chairs and an empty suitcase, there is the same plastic reindeer Billy rode onstage the night he became Mr. UNC, "the University's most spirited individual." There is a dessicated leather sombrero roasting in the sun and an unopened package of plastic handcuffs from a toy store with a note scrawled on the back: "Dear Billy, They say June weddings are the best. How 'bout it? Lolita."

Writing about Billy Warden is like trying to nail Jell-O to a wall. Everyone has a Billy Warden story. There was the time he climbed down through a manhole in the Pit and emerged moments later swearing up and down that he'd seen former UNC president William Friday hunkered down in the sewer. There was the time he canvassed Franklin Street in his fluorescent green jump suit and gave away free samples of a delicacy he called "furry doowinkles," made from toothpaste and Chinese noodles. It was Billy who promised to convert the gas stations of Chapel Hill into "Funoco Stations" and first uncovered the University's secret practice of issuing anti-sex pills to incoming freshman women. And on and on.

Billy Warden, to put it vaguely, is a "celebrity," the only one we have, and his celebrity and talent are amorphous, wide-ranging. He's involved in graphic art. He's involved in broadcast media. He's involved in print journalism. He's involved in music. He's involved in theater, forensics and public relations. He's involved in the process of making his life a poem—one that is funny and rich and shared constantly with the people around him. And like any busy artist, he is interested in creating and doing more than he's interested in explaining himself.

While one of Billy's eight competitors in the race for the Mr. UNC crown actually announced he intended to use his "power" to stop apartheid in South Africa if elected, Billy had this to say about his own bid:

"I have an extra internal organ, and it's a Henry Kissinger-shaped organ between my stomach and liver. It emits fumes and juices that force me into doing things like this." And after he won, interviewed astraddle his plastic reindeer and garbed in his purple cape and peaked witch's hat, he said: "I feel like an orange tree that thinks it's growing oranges, and one day a huge person comes along with a four-foot flexible, multi-colored, polka-dotted foam rubber fang and says, 'These aren't oranges. They're mother-of-pearl inlaid diamonds.'" In other words, Billy was pleased.

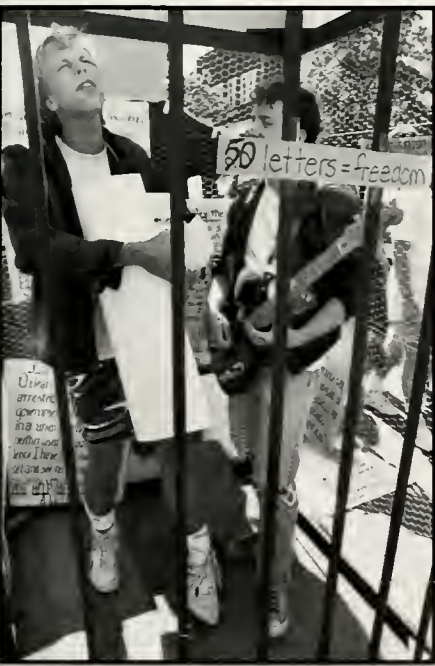

Rumor has it that Billy has "mellowed" in his last year at UNC. One explanation is that he is channeling a good portion of his effusive, hypernatural energy into his band. Suddenly Billy Warden and the Floating Children seem to be playing every club in the Triangle. They are also planning their first full-length album, to be produced and distributed with the help of Record Bar Chairman Barry Bergman.

The band is surprisingly good, the music is eminently danceable and completely original. In the Floating Children Billy has found, for the moment at least, a vehicle for a more concise articulation of his favorite madcap themes: the humorous aspects of the "human sexual response" ("Butt" and "Pink Underwear"); the weird world of the homogenized New South ("Electric Southern Boy"); sensual, childlike visions of nature and technology ("Sprinkler"); the fun and foolishness of popular cinema ("Nightmare on Elm Street, Part IV"). And in songs like "Cosmic Rock Star" and with the help of his ubiquitous Republican go-go girls, Billy parodies the rock music medium itself, while he retains all the hypnotic power of the demigod rockandroller.

Not everyone has joined the Billy Warden personality cult. There are those who think there must be something wrong with his brain. There are those who write him off as "a flake." There are those cynics who believe he is cynical, a self-promoter, a medium without a message. No matter; the "question" of Billy Warden is in the end a question of faith—you either have it or you don't. True believers know that if you have missed Billy Warden, you have missed the boat to fantasy island.

Mellowing In Rust

A Sculptor Copes with Criticism and Indifference

by Beth Haas

When I first interviewed James Heath Miller two years ago, I knew him as Max. But for the article he told me to refer to him as Jim.

So when I went through the first draft of the article I was writing for the Phoenix, I changed all the Maxs to Jims and thought it strange that his given name didn't fit him nearly so well as the name he gave himself.

Max from Where the Wild Things Are seemed far more appropriate for the sullen, very thin man who chain-smoked imported cigarettes opposite me in the classically dim atmosphere of the Carolina Coffee Shop.

In much the same way that the Coffee Shop seemed to strive for elegance—falling one step short—Max, at times earnestly, at times laconically, described the universal statement he was trying to make with his huge concrete and steel structure in front of the Davis Library. Through that piece, he said at the time, he was speaking for the common man, expressing an ineffable angst, forcing the existential dilemma into bold form: “a fist slamming down on the world.”

That was over two years ago, and the Max who asked me to call him Jim I now know as Heath. And though within the last year he displayed another large steel sculpture on the UNC campus, he has not created a new sculpture in almost a year.

Now as the gnarled steel fist slowly rusts into its concrete base, Heath shies away from his former pronouncements of profound meaning and universal significance. As he said in a recent interview, “the grandiose statements are bullshit.”

Now he claims simply that the Davis sculpture “works.” “It works in the way it geometrically deals with the space,” he said.

As is his habit, we met late at night after he closed Swensen's Ice Cream Factory, where he has worked for almost five years. With his still very thin legs jutting out of shorts, which if I saw on anyone else would label him to me a bagger, and a couple books—I assumed philosophy—scattered about him, he “rambled” for me.

He said he had little to bullshit about this time and that his attitude and very approach to his “first big piece” were very naive.

“As part of my education, it was good for what it was,” he said. “I had only been doing sculpture a year before I did that. And it was good for what it was trying to do even though at the time I had these grandiose ideas. I wouldn't have said this then, but the sheer scale of the work made it very safe because it's intimidating. It clearly took a lot of work. And with a large piece, it forces people to react—you're sure to get a response.”

The magnitude of the Davis sculpture and its prominent place on campus did force a reaction, and public response catalyzed the changes in his attitude toward his work perhaps as much as doing the piece itself.

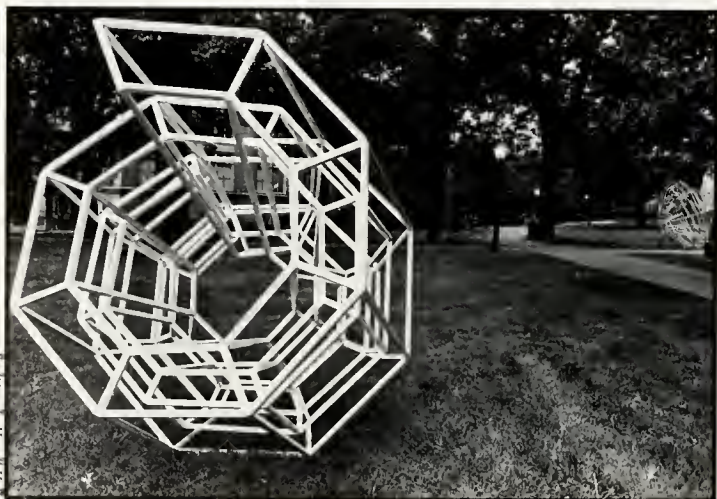

I remember hanging out at the sculpture listening to passing comments—and everyone who passed by did comment—as Heath, in his worn jeans and white T-shirts, directed the maintenance crew in pouring the concrete and welding the steel.

Whether or not the sculpture's message was universal, the response seemed universally shared. I heard it called the wrecked helicopter, a rat's nest and, now, the sculpture from hell.

Slightly defensive but hardly apologetic, Heath said, “It fits perfectly with what I was about at the time. So the negative reaction, the way people were approaching it, really blew me away. I couldn't believe the antagonism to the first one. That made me sit back and think. I thought it was my fault.”

He added, with the same ease with which I've heard him rattle off the role of various artists in the complex relationships between art movements, “It messed me up bad.”

When he displayed his second piece—large, steel, three separate parts,

Sculpture by Howell Hall

Foster

Sculpture by Davis Library

Minton

Heath Miller

near Howell Hall—it was vandalized by students, and for a few nights he stayed with it to see who would want to attack his art, this time physically.

"The last pieces, I don't think were my fault," he said. "They weren't overbearing. They were very light and airy. The only problem was, possibly, they were very attractive, overly attractive. But the attitude of the vandals was drunken revelry. I don't think they were directing anger toward an object generally held up in society as some privilege or rank. I don't think those people had the capacity to make those distinctions.

"I just don't think the atmosphere on campus is conducive to sculpture or art in general. I really don't. And I'm not sure whose fault that is. You don't have to be super intelligent to approach something that's unfamiliar and attempt to deal with it. A small percentage of people will deal with it, people from all walks of life."

During the interview I noted how quickly he wanted to point out his naivete of two years ago and show how relaxed he'd become about others' regard for his work. But also, as the ashtray filled and even I reached my limit of Diet Cokes, I never concluded that he had sold out.

He seemed instead to have come to a turning point where frustration with the "corruption" of American "cultureless" society led him to other outlets.

"There is no connection here with anything," he said. "It's just freewheeling; it's lost; it's drifting aimlessly because there is no connection with a value system, history or anything. Money is the only thing that matters. And this generation especially has had the real good life. It's always been 'go out there and get as much as you can. It's all there for you.' That's the whole direction of American society. It's why I'm leaving the country."

So instead of building massive structures as testaments to his talent and energy, he studies philosophy and plans to go to Germany now to learn German, so he doesn't have to read its great philosophers in translation. After a time in Germany he plans to study art in South Africa, where the people, because of racial turmoil, cannot afford to be so complacent, he said.

When I said that maybe there was a connection between the common UNC dream of owning a BMW and becoming an investment banker and the individualistic spirit of his drive to create, he stopped me.

Leaning forward, one hand in a loosely clenched fist, his normally brooding eyes gleaming with determination, he said: "Something can be yours, your own work, but if it's not innovative, you haven't gone far enough. You haven't said anything for anyone to think about. I want to really hit that note, say something with other than sheer size. I want to say something more tangible, to take risks in the art world so the idea has more impact. I want so badly just to get it...I don't know."

To get it would be getting more than a fine car and chic apartment. To get it, I agreed, would be to say something.

Profile

The Smith Center Hues

Why isn't Dean's Dome Carolina Blue?

by Jo Fleischer

Basketball fans who fancy themselves architecture critics have only one beef with the Dean E. Smith Activities Center, the colossal octagonal structure where the North Carolina Tar Heels play their ball: "The Dean Dome is not Carolina blue," they complain.

The building's major aesthetic flaw is so glaringly obvious that it virtually screams at you: "No, these bricks are not sky blue!"

The structure's exterior, its builders say, is composed of "tan fascia aggregate panels from a quarry in South Carolina which help it blend in with its natural surroundings. Nearby groves of trees..." Wrong, wrong, wrong. The building's exterior is totally inconsistent with the tasteful and partisan color-scheme of its cavernous innards.

Inside, the seats are blue, as are the walls, the counters, a large portion of the playing surface, the ceiling and the carpets. Even the adjacent Maurice J. Koury Natatorium is utterly blue.

Why then, some fans ask, can't the color of the building's exostructure be of the same shade of blue that decorates everything else even remotely connected with the revered tradition of Tar Heel round ball?

Obviously, money was no object in making the statement 'yes, the Heels are a basketball force to be reckoned with.' Statements are expensive. In this case it took $38 million to construct a basketball shrine rivaling even the Sistine Chapel in its magnanimous edification of its object. This object happens to be the man who counsels young seven-foot-tall men on the art of stuffing an orange sphere through a thin metal toroid elevated 10 feet off the ground. This man, whose team wears sky blue, who himself favors blue suits and who lives under a blue sky, favors baby blue: the Dean E. Smith.

"But wouldn't a seven-and-a-half acre building just one shade shy of Smurf blue appear to be just a little garish?" ask those who favor earth tones in their clothing—and in their basketball arenas.

"You spent 38 million clams on a gymnasium, and you're worried about appearances," answer the blue boosters.

But it would be rash to tear down the walls to right this small question of color. Those who favor blue bricks are content to wait until the tawny bricks need replacing.

After all, they hold rights to their seats into the next millennium and need only to instill blue values in their children (who are due to inherit the seats) and to urge them to go forth and replace brown bricks with blue. The blue crew can afford to wait. And they are content with what they already have—a veritable Valhalla of round ball.

The blue and brown brick-favoring Dome builders are a collection of Tar Heel alumni. They're known as the Educational Foundation, or more accurately as the Rams Clubbers (not because they club sheep, but because that's what the club is called). These Rams Clubbers graduated from UNC back in the days before the boys that Silent Sam now remembers were lost in what later came to be known as the War Between the States.

Since their graduation, these men and women have acquired a great passion for basketball and a great deal of money. Hence when one of their ranks, the late great Hargrave "Skipper" Bowles, had a dream about watching his ball from a comfortable courtside seat much like his La-Z-Boy at home—instead of sitting on a wooden bench in a gym with a bunch of loud obnoxious students—others soon came to share this dream.

The donations poured in, especially after an inventive marketing strategy was developed. For a donation of $250,000 or more, one could ensure one's continued rights to purchase season tickets and to watch basketball from a comfortable seat for eternity, with the reserved right to pass on that privilege when one died. An additional sum would guarantee parking space for a similar period. Oh, some student tennis courts would have to be bulldozed, but all in the pursuit of allowing a few to watch a sport rather than allowing many to get all sweaty and smelly playing one.

Students would be content with the 3,000 seats furnished to them by the Rams Club in a fit of noblesse oblige.

In a flash the Rams had collected the $38 million. In August 1982, they rushed out and immediately started buying bulk quantities of anything Carolina blue. They blasted out 20,000 tons of decidedly unblue rocks and earth for the 300,000 square foot sites; bought nearly $500,000 of blue speakers and microphones to tell fans what they were seeing; got four blue scoreboards and two message boards, which flash messages like "Let's Go Heels" and other catchy slogans in four different colors (including blue); and bought more than 20,000 blue seats including the blue courtside La-Z-Boys with high backs and arm rests. And, it's rumored, these plush seats even contain pulsating electric "magic fingers" to rouse even the most lifeless octogenerian fan when the action gets hot and heavy.

The playing floor itself is a "Spring-Aire" system set on hundreds of tiny shock absorbers, which allows the floor to "give" one-eighth inch whenever several players create pressure in the same area.

The roof, not blue—yet—is a 15,000 square foot affair with a small teflon coated fiberglass white dome at the top to let the light shine in from the Carolina blue sky overhead. Underneath the roof are a collection of blue banners, rivaling the United Nations' collection in quantity (not color) to commemorate the success of the Heels in a number of crusades against less proficient teams unguided by the mighty Dean with his 579-171 record.

And that's just the playing area. It doesn't even begin to describe the inner catacombs housing the pool, locker rooms, offices and a "Donor's Room" complete with its own basketball museum. The locker room is a classic affair done in a tasteful blue color throughout, with one exception: the toilets are white. In deference to the players' extraordinary size, the sinks, mirrors, showerheads, hand/hair dryers and the aforementioned bowls are elevated to superhuman heights.

Open since a Jan. 18, 1986 game against the dark blue team of Duke, the Dean Dome (as it has come to be called, not because of Dean's hair, which is bountiful, but because of its roof, which is white and dome-like) has become a multi-activity venue. But its main function will only be the edification of North Carolina's chief cagers, their fans and the man who made them number one.

Basketball Valhalla, the Dean Dome, the SAC (one word—so called by those still too naive to concede that its not the Student anything anymore), the S.A.C., the Place, the house that Dean built, the proper Dean E. Smith Activities Center or, improper, Dean's SAC—no matter what you call it, it still is not blue. But, with a little luck and with a lot of blue bricks, the building could become a hulking blue monument to the man, whose partisans believed that accolades alone were not enough.

Jo Fleischer is assistant University editor of The Daily Tar Heel.

The Exalted Order of the Hasbeens

A Toast for Status Quoism

I'd rather be a could be
If I could not be an are
For a could be is a maybe
With a chance of reaching par

But I'd rather be a hasbeen
Than a might-have-been by far
For a might-have-been has never been
While a hasbeen was once an are

Profile

Working With Angels

Valuing Student Contact

by Clifton Dowell

The new president of the University of North Carolina usually has lunch in Lenoir Hall once a week. It has been 37 years since Clemmie Dixon Spangler Jr. first began eating in Lenoir as a freshman at UNC. He resumed the habit in 1986 when he became the president of the UNC system. He said although his job gives him the opportunity to interact with students regularly, there can never be enough contact.

He said his respect for education dates to early childhood.

"When I was a young boy in Charlotte, I knew how much my mother and father respected the schools where I went," he said. "They respected the principal as being a leader in the community, and they respected the school teachers. That respect was so obvious to me that it never occurred to me not to have that respect. I guess that's one of the reasons I'm here today."

Spangler is a relaxed and polite man who enjoys backpacking in the Rockies once a year and reading biographies of great men.

Beverung

The examples of Winston Churchill, who failed repeatedly and yet would not accept his failures; and of Abraham Lincoln, who led an almost entirely disloyal cabinet, interest and inspire Spangler.

"The basis of leadership, in my estimation, is having a background steeped in the liberal arts," he said.

Someone called upon to head a leading scientific firm will "be dealing with people, not scientific equations," he said.

"The University must educate people to look at their options and to feel some degree of comfort with change," he said, "because change is with us. To be able to live with it is a great asset. It is not a great asset to be so technically and narrowly trained that when technology changes you lose your job."

In a larger world view Spangler sees education as "one hope—the best hope" for solving the critical problems that face society today.

He said that the main issue facing people today has probably never changed since the beginning of time:

"It is simply for all of us to learn to live together in as much peace as we can possibly engender," he said.

He said that he has never seen any system of government that rivals democracy as the "best mechanism for keeping peace."

He believes that America is still a place of opportunity where people from a humble background can get to a position of real leadership through their own abilities. Many people, however, lose their opportunity for success by having the wrong idea of success, he said.

"Success, in my mind, is knowing what you do well and doing it," he said. "It does not have a relationship to economics. It does not have a relationship to how many times your name is on the front page of the newspaper. It has only the relationship of being what you do well."

Spangler graduated from UNC-Chapel Hill in 1954 with a bachelor of science degree and obtained a master's in business administration from Harvard Graduate School in 1956. He then spent two years in the U.S. Army and in 1958 returned to his hometown of Charlotte to a job with the C.D. Spangler Construction Co., which had been founded by his father.

In 1973, while serving as president of the rapidly expanding company, he became chairman of the Bank of North Carolina. The 70-branch institution prospered under his leadership and was merged in 1982 into the NCNB Corp.

A background of active involvement reflects Spangler's regard for public education. He was elected to the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education in 1972 and served as vice chairman from 1974 to 1976. He was chairman of the N.C. State Board of Education from 1982 until early 1986 and co-chaired Gov. James B. Hunt's Commission on Education for Economic Growth in 1984.

He is enjoying his new job.

"I like meeting new people and seeing new situations that are of benefit to the University, and trying to make those people and situations work together so that they help," he said.

"The University of North Carolina," Spangler said, "is the best state university in the nation. My goal would be to keep it that way—to do what we have done before and to do it better if we can; to get support for our faculty; to remember that the reason we are here is to educate students."

"I've always enjoyed being around teachers. It's a good profession with people who are really well-motivated and do a marvelous job."

"Being associated with young people, with students, has got to be working on the side of the angels."

So Long, So What?

Post-Graduation Hometown Blues

by Ava Long

Dear Leslie,
Well, howdy, muchacha, qué tal? How's your job with that advertising agency going? How's Jeff? How's N.Y.C.?

I is grajooated from collage now, and my mama and daddy are real proud. This was something I'd been eagerly awaiting for a long, long time, but it's not quite what I had expected.

I don't really know what I expected, but here I am, sittin' on my grandma's front porch, unemployed, listening to the bullfrogs chirp.

My father gave me money for a down payment on a new car, but now I have to make payments. And since I haven't found a job yet, Mama has taken me back under her wing, and I have moved back home, regressing into a state of childish bliss.

Long

Six months ago, I was in a bad frame of mind. You and all the rest of my friends, it seemed, had graduated and moved away to exciting new lives. I felt like my last year at UNC was a prison sentence, and I marked each day off on the calendar as it passed. I was so busy wishing my life away that I forgot to relax and just be a student. I made decent grades, but I was slack with my classes and cynical about the people around me. This was my fifth year at UNC, and I was simply tired of being there.

I walked to classes from my apartment, wearing a large, floppy hat that covered most of my face, dark sunglasses and my Walkman headphones, listening to loud, abrasive music. And probably wearing a scowl on my face. I stopped going into the Pit between my classes, stopped picking up the DTH, and even stopped listening to WXYC.

I fantasized buying a big pickup truck with a camper, selling or giving away most of my possessions and heading west for adventure.

Since I've been at home, unemployed and broke, I've had a lot of time to think these things over. I don't want to stay at home for very long, but I am enjoying my time here. I'm spending a lot of time with my mother, brother and grandmother, who will celebrate her 76th birthday this month. I might as well make the best of it.

Well, Leslie, when I scrape up some money, maybe I'll visit y'all in New York. Or maybe you can come down here for a weekend and visit me here on the farm. I'd love to see you.

Solong,
Avalong
